Fungus Amongus @Ro2 Again & again

...I also love this imagery and thinking about giant spores taking over gas-guzzling automobiles sets me free from the earthly plane. I like floating around out there, and unlike the pic at the top of this story, it would never have got us into any trouble, because it doesn't appeal to our or anybody else's prurient interests but instead to our collective senses of humor. The concept of demon spores finding life-giving sustenance in old fuel and lubricants is just delicious.

Perhaps it would be best if you engaged more directly in their information on their website at <http://www.worldofnomadicfungi.com> although there's plenty of it here:

It all sounds and looks intelligent and real, but of course, it's a big farce, though one I'm more than willing to participate in. The guy who creates these fantasies doesn't call himself the artist. He is the curator. And Ro and Ro are just the facilitators. But every time I see more of the evidence of these flights of fantasy, the more intrigued by the possibilities of it I become. Seems like every time I visit Ro2 on Ervay in The Cedars, there's more spores.

"The Spore Sprouting Test is the latest exhibition by the Nomadic Fungi Institute (NFI). This exhibition "represents the culmination of two years of research, and provides a step-by-step guide to the scientific process used in these tests."

"By collection and germinating Nomadic Fungus spores NFI has taken the dangerous but necessary step in proving once and for all that the existence of this various eater of automobiles is not an urban myth or the hallucinations of drug addled beatniks."
