

Crowds check out Michelle Jaffe's ArtPrize entry, "Wappen Field," at the Urban Institute for Contemporary Arts in Grand Rapids, Mich. Wednesday, Sept. 21, 2011. ArtPrize is back for a third year and aims to draw 500,000 people to the southwestern Michigan city of Grand Rapids for the event that begins Wednesday and runs through Oct. 9. While the winners of most art competitions are decided by a few professionals, ArtPrize allows any adult to enter and any attendee to vote for the winners. (AP Photo/The Grand Rapids Press, T.J. US searches for a cultural response to economic hardship

Some shows and films evoke the 1960s while others reflect anxiety, with artists choosing between escapism and grim reality. By any standards, watching Jeff Nichols's much lauded film Take Shelter is a haunting experience. Its central character, Curtis LaForche, a working-class Midwesterner trying to hold on to his family, job and sanity in rural Ohio, is increasingly plagued by apocalyptic dreams ...

Detroit evolving into a haven for artists

Cheap rents and a pioneering spirit are attracting artists, restaurants and nightspots to Detroit's decimated urban core. It's still early, but change is palpable. "Where you headed?" asked the cheerful driver of the rental-car shuttle at the Detroit airport.
