What is the first action we take when we move our 'home' from one geographical location to another, from a familiar community to an unfamiliar community. What is our instinct in that new world, what lessons do we bring from our old home to our new.

Comparative curiosity is a useful term, and it means to compare what you are curious about with what you are already know. Being somewhere new is akin to being the new student in a strange new school. New people who either share your curiosity or don't will at least ask your name and then move on, but some will stay, ask more questions, you ask yours and a new history is started.

We have arrived with our differences and similarities comparing our old school experiences to our new school environment, overlaying a new palette with our fading memories to create new personal histories.

Interpreting Sharon, our new school, our new social landscape, with its people, pastures, streets, architecture and history has become part of our creative and visual dialogue.
